Great Expectations: The place of Detached Youth Work in the future?

As detached youth work becomes centre-stage in a variety of social policy agendas, the debate continues as to whether this constitutes real 'opportunity'. Are these tainted by a shift from a history based more on the values of informal education and, particularly, the youth work relationship, to (and perhaps at best) youth work as a 'progressive response to crime'?

Will the rolling out of Integrated Youth Support Services spell the marginalisation of this distinctive form of practice or will detached youth work step forward and lead a more progressive agenda?

Following on from a hugely successful conference last year, the Federation for Detached Youth Work hopes to build upon the positivity of that gathering by inviting participation in a debate framed around the critical question:
'What is the place of detached youth work in the future?'
